Blind Section Hand Uses Wife's Eyes To 'See' His Work

Young Woman Began Working On The Railroad During the War Period

KANSAS CITY, MO. — Mary Alonge, who stands over five feet tall in men's work shoes, admits that her job as a section hand with her blind husband is the best work she's ever had.

A broad grin lights up Mary's round, smudged face as she talks about her work of cleaning out boxcars at the Rock Island's dump yards here. Shoveling dirt, unloading whatever debris has accumulated in the cars, wielding a pick in cold weather to loosen frozen ground, all are part of an eight hour daily shift for Mary, who's been employed here for five years.

Working constantly beside the young woman is her husband, Joe, tall, slender and dark, who needs her with him because of failing eyesight. Physicians who have examined Joe have given no hope that his sight will ever be improved.

"If he could see better, he would be doing something else. Well, we both work," commented Mary.

Since a railroad yard isn't exactly the place for frills, this stocky woman wears men's overalls, a leather jacket and an old wool scarf tied around her head.

Mary began her job during the war, when all the railroads, desperate for help, first began hiring women as laborers. Her husband, who had been rejected by the army because of his almost sightless eyes, was employed at the yard doing piecework. One day Joe's boss came around and asked him if his wife wanted to work.

Mary went down the next day and "never quit." There were about 40 women in the yards then, cleaning tracks and doing other labor formerly done by men. Most would quit or lay off when cold weather came along. Today, only one other feminine worker, a switch oiler, is still there.

Mary and Joe each earn 94 cents an hour, which brings their week's income to $90.24. And they are saving as much as they are able—what with doctor's bills and increased prices—so they can buy a little house. They have long dreamed of it.

Money Grows On Bushes, Not Trees, This Woman Discovers

BICKNELL, IND.—Mrs. Oscar Flake often heard the sarcastic phrase, "Do you think money grows on trees?" but she never thought she'd see the day when she could truthfully answer, "No, it grows on bushes."

Walking home from the grocery she spotted a $20 bill on a bush. Amazed, she started picking and soon had $95. But Mrs. Finke didn't keep the money.

It was part of a cached nest egg which a neighbor buried under a flower pot for a vacation trip. The wind blew the bills away and they caught on the bush.

African Hunter Tells Tribulations In Hunting Baboons

Youthful Zoologist Will Collect A Series of Skeletons of Small Animals

TAUNGS, SOUTH AFRICA — A leader of the University of California expedition seeking a series of baboon skulls here told of the many tribulations encountered in hunting the wary animals.

Thomas W. Larson, who heads the zoological program, said:

"The baboons are extremely wild and I usually have to shoot them from $60 to 1,000 yards, which is quite difficult, since they jump around like jacks-in-the-box."

The youthful zoologist's objectives are to collect a series of skeletons of small animals for use by the paleontologists and a mounted series for the university's museum of vertebrate zoology.

Larson now has specimens of 52 species of mammals and scores of reptiles of various types, in addition to an assortment of frogs, poisonous snakes and other forms, which he has preserved in alcohol. One of his assignments was to prepare and ship the skeleton of an elephant.

Larson reported that he had collected skulls of two rare aard wolves, insect-eating hyenas whose teeth have been reduced to tiny nubs, near Potsdata Flat. He was planning a week's trip with a professional hunter in search of equally rare aard varks.

The aard vark is a mammal with a pig-like snout, erect ears and strong claws, which it uses to dig into termite hills for food. It leaves its burrow only at night and is seldom seen. The aard vark uses its long, sticky tongue to trap the termites, it feeds through years of disuse, having been reduced to pegs.

Larson still also seek to add ratels, meerkats and long-eared foxes to his collection.

Farmer Blames Loss of His Arm On Baler Company

Baler Company says Warnings and Safeguard Measures are Issued But Not Needed

MONROE, WIS.—Clarence Yaun, New Glarus farmer, who lost his right arm in a rotary hay baler, was awarded $36,500 in a suit against the manufacturer but an appeal against the verdict is almost certain.

The baler, a one man operation, rolls hay or straw into a round, compact bale. An eight foot conveyor platform carries windrowed hay into a series of fast moving metal rolls. The hay is rolled up like a carpet and is tied by twine which feeds into the machine. The roll is ejected when it reaches the correct size.

Testimony in the Yaun case showed that Yaun had encountered trouble with the twine when the machine ran over a thin part of the field and little hay fed into the baler. He left the power on between tractor and baler, got off the tractor and put one foot on the conveyor platform.

He tossed a handful of hay into the rollers. The front rollers, moving at six feet a second, caught his fingers. In a flash his arm had been crushed.

Atty. Edward T. O'Neal of Fond du Lac, counsel for Yaun, charged the company with negligence:

"There was omission of safety devices that would have prevented the accident. More, there should have been automatic twine equipment so that the operator would not have to leave the tractor seat."

Yaun Was Warned

The jury agreed, finding that the firm was negligent for having no automatic twine feeder, no "quick stop" apparatus and no protective shield on the rolls of the machine.

Evidence presented by the manufacturer showed that Yaun was told how to operate the machine. It was owned by John Erb, New Glarus farm machinery dealer, who was doing custom work for farmers. Yaun worked for him and had been warned of the machine's dangers.

A standard safety sign on the machine said: "Never step on machine when in operation."

Company instructions warned: "Never attempt to feed twine under the press roll by hand. If the twine is not fed under the press by the material, throw a small amount of hay at a time to start under the press roll."

Company attorneys declared that the rolls "presented an obvious danger . . . (and) the machine is perfectly safe when the operator does what he is told."

Suits As Old As Power

Engineers testified that an automatic twine feeder, such as cited by the jury, had not been designed. They said they were doubtful that one could be superior to the feeder in use on the machine. They contended that the baler is accident-proof when an operator stands on the ground to toss in the hay.

The present suit is only one of many in which farm machinery operators have been charged with negligence in designing their equipment. The lawsuits started almost as soon as power farming started. Many years ago a farm tractor manufacturer finally changed gear design in the machine after he had been flooded with claims for deaths and injuries. The old gears had caused the tractors to tip over when front wheels hit a bump.

Corn shredders and ensilage cutters have been the subject of many suits. They are the most hazardous machines on the farm. Testimony has shown that no matter how many safeguards are on them, farmers still disregard flashing blades and grab an ear of corn to untangle a jam.

Italians Claim Depth Record For New Midget Submarine

MILAN, ITALY.—A midget submarine designed by Pietro Vassena reached a depth of 1,329 feet in Lake Como, a son of the inventor said. It was believed no crew was aboard.

The inventor said the previous record depth for a submarine was 453 feet. The son said his father had given no details of the test. The submarine is called the Vassena C3.

The sub with Vassena and another man aboard reached a depth of 771 feet. The submarine is 25 feet in length. It was designed to go to a depth of 2,625 feet.

HEALTH HINTS for LIVESTOCK

PREPARED BY AMERICAN FOUNDATION FOR ANIMAL HEALTH

TIPS FOR BETTER CARE OF CALVES

In view of today's high prices of meat and feed, livestock raisers are probably more concerned than ever before with the need for raising healthy, fast-growing, vigorous calves.

Health precautions can save many more calves.

Every calf lost due to mismanagement or disease, before it gets into full production or reaches market age and weight, is a terrific financial loss and a waste of feed.

Steps to assure the best possible calf crop begin with the proper care and feeding of the pregnant cow. Good quality hay, balanced with minerals, vitamins and proteins, is especially important. Dehydrated hay contains plenty of Vitamin A, for instance, but little Vitamin D. In providing minerals, it should be kept in mind that not only calcium and phosphorus, but also supplemental iron, copper and cobalt, are necessary in some localities. The local veterinarian can usually advise as to which mineral deficiencies exist in any area.

Clean maternity stalls are important, too, to give calves a healthy start, and reduce the danger of joint ill, scours and pneumonia. These same troubles can be caused also by failure to properly disinfect the navels of new calves and keep them away from contaminated pastures.

Calf pails should be cleaned thoroughly; milk is an excellent place for germs to grow and multiply. If possible, the colostrum (first milk after birth) should be saved and fed to the calves. Colostrum contains needed vitamins and helps build resistance to infection.

Besides following sound management and feeding practices, the calf raiser should be alert for signs of disease, and take prompt steps if they appear.

Girl's Plea to Marry Slayer Saves Him From Death Chair

NASHVILLE, TENN.—A 20-year-old girl who pleaded for permission to marry a killer before he went to the electric chair saved her sweetheart's life.

Gov. Jim McCord commuted the death sentence of Daniel Budzynski, 19, to 99 years of imprisonment. But he sternly disapproved a marriage between the convict and Jeanne Lucas, a Pittsburgh Sunday School teacher.

Miss Lucas was undismayed. "There will still be a wedding," she said.

Budzynski was to have died in the electric chair with Richard Reilly, trigger-man in a holdup in which a Beale street merchant was killed in Memphis in 1946. Reilly still faces the chair but McCord is considering his case.

Miss Lucas showed up in Nashville accompanied by Henrietta Budzynski, Daniel's sister. They borrowed $200 from a Pittsburg grocer to come here and make a desperate plea for Budzynski's life or, failing that, obtain permission for Miss Lucas to marry him before he went to the chair.
